

National Hispanic Environmental Council

These photos depict some of the actual places where the NHEC Institute will be held. All scenes are located at or near the Glorieta Conference Center in New Mexico.

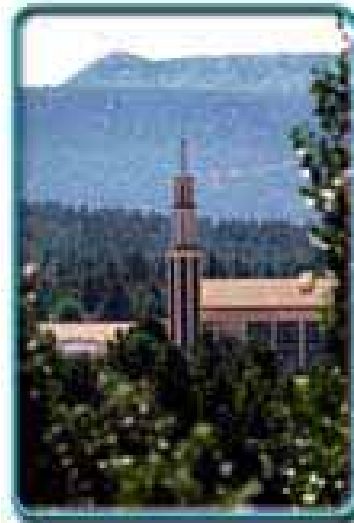

Attendees at Glorieta enjoy full use of the many nature trails that crisscross the Center.

Glorieta Conference Center, as seen from across their lake.

Glorieta has comfortable, modern sleeping rooms for attendees.

The steeple at the Glorieta church is a well-known local landmark.

National Hispanic Environmental Council

The Lifeway Glorieta Conference Center

Glorieta is in a beautiful, scenic area of Northern New Mexico, about 18 miles from Santa Fe. Much of the Institute's training will occur outdoors, surrounded by America's natural heritage.

Glorieta has modern conference facilities, with a "touch of the west."

Just one of the trails at Glorieta where students will study and learn the Institute's coursework.

Institute students will explore environmental issues under New Mexico's famous bright blue skies.

National Hispanic Environmental Council

NHEC Institute Program Coordinator Juan Rodriguez at the entrance of some of the caves and old mines near Glorieta. (Note: under no circumstances will students enter any caves or mine shafts).

The Institute is funded in part by the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture (through the USDA NRCS). Shown here is the Ranger Station for the Santa Fe National Forest, near Glorieta.

The banks of the shallow Pecos River is one location where students will learn principles about the role of water for people and the earth.

Students will visit the pueblo ruins at Pecos National Monument to explore how history, culture, and the environment are inter-related. The Institute is also supported by the National Park Service, who oversee Pecos National Monument.